Why does Victoria love FGA?

FGA's multi-state and national approach to welfare, health care, and work policy is uniquely focused on helping millions to experience the life-changing power of work.

Victoria Eardley is the marketing director at the Foundation for Government Accountability, where she manages the creative, digital, and distribution teams and executes strategies to market FGA's mission towards targeted audiences. Victoria also co-hosts FGA's podcast, Built to Win.

Before joining FGA, Victoria spent time as an independent contractor developing policy research and working with several policy groups in the conservative communications and public relations space. She holds a Bachelor of Arts in Applied Communications and Political Science from Cedarville University and a Master of Arts in Public Interest Communications from The University of Florida.

Pairing her talents with her passion for serving others, Victoria is driven to help others end the cycle of dependency, create security for their families, and pursue the American Dream. Her work has been featured in the Washington Examiner, Real Clear, Inside Sources, USA Today, the Federalist, National Review, and more.

Outside of work, Victoria enjoys running, anything sci-fi, and volunteering at her local church. She and her husband, John, live in Dallas, Texas with their two fur babies, Jaxson and Arya.
